

Website pages

Home

Hero page – Showreel

Selected works

Treasures of Tamil Nadu

Treasures of Tamil Nadu is a film celebrating the state's GI-tagged products through the stories of the people who make them. From jewellery and textiles to food and handicrafts, every treasure becomes a story of skill passed down through generations, connecting the maker, the product and the place it comes from.

CROCS - The world's most delightfully comfortable shoes

This film takes us behind the scenes of how Crocs are made in India, told through the voices of the people who make them. From technology and precision to rigorous quality checks, we show how every pair meets Crocs' global standards—told with the brand's signature sense of fun and playfulness.

Saregama – Avan paathu sirikkala

For Saregama's Avan Paathu Sirikkala, we tapped into the universal awkwardness and charm of unspoken feelings. The song was visualised through a familiar moment when you like someone, but have absolutely no idea what they're thinking; we created a story that made the song feel instantly relatable—while keeping the music at the centre of the experience.

UNICEF 'Be a champion'

For UNICEF's Be a Champion campaign, we created a film celebrating the potential of every girl to be a champion. Featuring Sachin Tendulkar and cricket celebrities, the film uses the influence of a sporting legend to encourage girls to believe in themselves, dream bigger and pursue their ambitions.

Tiranga song

The Tiranga song captures India through the hopes and dreams of its children. As children across the country raise the national flag, they share their vision of the India they dream of—one filled with possibility, pride and hope.

IJM – ‘Some bonds must break’

For IJM, Some Bonds Must Break is a fictional account inspired by the lives of bonded labourers in Tamil Nadu. The film portrays the abuse, exploitation and lack of freedom they face every day, bringing their lived realities to the forefront and highlighting the need to break the cycles that keep people trapped in bonded labour.

Vijaya Hospitals

A pioneer in Chennai’s healthcare since 1972, Vijaya Hospitals had gradually faded amid a changing healthcare landscape. The brand was given a much-deserved facelift, bringing its legacy into the present with the best medical professionals and the same devotion to Chennai and its people. We Know This City by Heart became the thought that brought it all together.

About

We don’t start with the logo.

We start with what makes you, you.

Our Story

Many years ago, a bunch of youngsters, bitten by the travel bug and curious about the world, set out on a journey.

Along the way, they met like-minded people—clients, collaborators and team members across sectors and geographies—who shared their belief that good communication begins with good thinking.

Somewhere along that journey, nologo was born.

From brand identities and films to campaigns, social impact and digital content, we’ve continued to explore new ways of making communication relevant, distinctive and memorable.

18 years on, the journey continues...

People behind the lens

Different minds. One way of working.

Filmmaker.

Writer.

Cinematographer.

Designer.

Strategist.

Editor.

Account Manager

Our Values

Stay curious.

We ask questions, look closer and never assume we already know the answer.

Keep it simple.

We believe clarity takes thinking. We strip away the unnecessary until the idea speaks for itself.

Be original.

We don't chase what's already been done. We look for an approach that feels right for the brand, the audience and the moment.

Stay human.

People are at the centre of everything we create. We listen, respect context and never lose sight of who we're communicating with.

Care about the work.

From the first thought to the final frame, we care about the details—and about making something we can stand behind.

Do it together.

The best ideas rarely belong to one person. We believe in open conversations, different perspectives and making the work better together.

Integrated portfolio/ What we do

- ❑ Brand Strategy — Positioning, purpose, messaging and communication strategy
- ❑ Brand Identity — Naming, visual identity, brand language and guidelines
- ❑ Campaigns — Big ideas, creative platforms and integrated campaigns
- ❑ Films — Brand films, corporate films, documentaries, impact films and digital video
- ❑ Design — Print, digital, publications, presentations and visual communication
- ❑ Content — Copywriting, editorial, scripts, social content and branded content
- ❑ Digital & Social — Digital campaigns, social media strategy, content and creative
- ❑ Animation & Motion — Explainers, motion graphics, animation and visual storytelling
- ❑ Photography — Brand, people, products, events and documentary photography
- ❑ Communication Collateral — Brochures, reports, presentations, toolkits and campaign material

What they say about us

Will share it....

Perspectives

1. AI, Creativity & the Thing That Still Needs a Human

AI can write. AI can design. AI can make a film. AI can give you ten ideas before you've finished your coffee. So, where does that leave creativity?

It is a question we're hearing more and more. And understandably so. The tools are getting better at a dizzying pace. What took a designer hours can now happen in minutes. A rough thought can become a visual. A few lines can become a film. A blank page suddenly has plenty on it. But perhaps the more interesting question isn't whether AI can create. It clearly can.

The question is: what makes something worth creating in the first place?

That still feels very human to us. Because an idea doesn't begin with a prompt. It begins with noticing something. A conversation overheard. A strange little detail. A contradiction. A question that won't go away. A person doing something in a way you've never seen before. A feeling you can't quite explain.

AI can help us explore possibilities. It can help us get past the blank page, test directions, visualise something before we make it, and sometimes surprise us with an idea we hadn't considered. But creativity isn't simply the ability to produce options.

It's the ability to choose. To know why one idea matters more than another. To understand whether something is appropriate for the audience, the context and the moment. To know when something clever is actually distracting. To recognise when a technically perfect image feels completely wrong.

And perhaps most importantly, to care about the person on the other side of the communication. That's where the human part becomes difficult to replace.

We've always believed that good communication begins with good thinking. AI doesn't change that. If anything, it makes it more important. When everyone can make almost anything, the real differentiator may no longer be the ability to produce. It may be the ability to notice, question, edit and choose.

So yes, we'll use AI. We'll experiment with it. Learn from it. Let it challenge the way we work. But we'll also keep doing some very old-fashioned things. Walking around. Talking to people. Looking closely. Getting things wrong. Arguing about one word. Sitting with an idea until it becomes clearer. And occasionally throwing away ten perfectly good options because the eleventh one feels right.

The tools may change. The need for curiosity doesn't.

2. Shooting in the Rural Heartlands of India

The camera doesn't always know where the story is.

Some of our shoots have taken us a long way from studios, controlled lighting and comfortable production schedules. Down roads that don't quite appear on Google Maps.

Into homes where the camera is a completely unfamiliar object. Across fields where the light changes before you've finished setting up. Into communities where people have more important things to do than wait for a filmmaker. And that's exactly why we love shooting there.

Because when you're working in rural India, you quickly learn that you can't control everything. You have to observe. You have to adapt. And, most importantly, you have to wait.

The production plan may say one thing. The place may have other ideas. The person you're filming may not say the perfect line. The weather may change. The light may disappear. A tractor may decide to become the loudest thing in the world just when you've finally got the interview you wanted. You learn to work with it.

More importantly, you learn to stop looking at a place only through the lens of a production. A village isn't a backdrop. A field isn't just a beautiful wide shot. A house isn't just a location. There are people living there. Working there. Raising families there. Negotiating their everyday lives there. And the camera needs to respect that.

Some of the best moments we've captured have happened when nobody was "performing". A woman going about her morning. A child watching the crew from a distance. A farmer explaining something with his hands because words aren't quite enough. Someone laughing between takes. Those moments can't really be scripted. That's perhaps the biggest lesson rural shoots have taught us.

Don't arrive with the entire film already in your head.

Arrive prepared, of course. Know what you're looking for. Know what you need. But leave enough room to discover something you didn't come looking for. Because sometimes the most important frame on a shoot is the one that wasn't on the shot list. And sometimes, the best thing a filmmaker can do is stop directing and start paying attention.

Got something brewing?

Let's talk.